Read an Excerpt Langston Hughes. "I Dream a World" The popular and political activist Langston Hughes, who was born in 1902, was a poet of African-American descent who lived in the United States during the first half of the twentieth century. Hughes was deeply involved in the Harlem Renaissance that took place in New York City. His major works were the poetry collections The Big Sea and The Ways of White Folks. The Big Sea contains images of African-Americans, images that showed Hughes was intrigued with black culture. The expression "the big sea" is a motif in Hughes's works, which refer to the ocean. Although the sense of the ocean is associated with death, Hughes also made use of images that show African-Americans using the ocean to protect themselves. In this sense, the depiction of African-Americans using the ocean is different from what is done by white writers. While white writers usually depict black characters as either being shunned or being associated with the ocean, Hughes wrote a poem called "Rainy Night in Harlem" (Hughes, 1946). Rainy Night in Harlem Bereft, to be sure, of the grandiloquence, and comic fancy that our contemporaries associate with the word "Harlem," the ragged brown read essay questions and discussion questions below 82157476af
